Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Educational Conditions in Spain The advent of this material prosperity, however, has been accompanied by results positively unfavorable to the spiritual and educational life of the nation. It was a prosperity from its very nature unevenly distributed, being confined virtually to the great mining corporations of the mountainous Provinces, and to the shipping companies of the coast cities. The cost of the necessities of life soared beyond all proportion to the wages and incomes of the great majority of the inhabitants of the Kingdom. The 25,000 or more teachers of Spain found existence increasingly difficult as the war went on. The increasing economic pressure lent a welcome excuse to the classes who are by tradition unfavorably disposed to popular education and constitute through the press and the Cortes the vocal elements of the nation; they declared all attempts to enlarge the educational system out of the question in the face of such dire national stress. Against these well-organized forces, the schools and the teachers, uninfluential and poorly organized, could make no headway. The nation-wide desperation of the teachers began to be openly expressed in their local, communal, and provincial assemblies early in 1918, and was voiced in a corporate demand for increased salaries by the national association. Upon Don Santiago Alba's acceptance of the ministry of public instruction in March, 1918, the movement received his cordial support, genuinely interested as he was in the improvement of the schools and the welfare of the teachers. There has been no national, and very slight local and communal, increase in the salaries of teachers since 1857, when the present school system was initiated. The average salary, of...
