The Impact of European Farm Subsidies on Developing Countries

By Olivia Achtelik

GRIN Verlag Jun 2012, 2012. Taschenbuch. Book Condition: Neu. 208x146x7 mm. This item is printed on demand - Print on Demand Neuware - Seminar paper from the year 2011 in the subject Politics - International Politics - Topic: Development Politics, printed single-sided, grade: A+ (1,0), Sookmyung Women's University, course: Fair Trade and Social Enterprises, language: English, abstract: The importance of Fair Trade products for the world economy has been significantly growing within the last decade. In 2010, the global Fair Trade turnover reached 3.4 billion showing an upward trend with double-digit growing rates per year. One of the biggest selling markets for certified Fair Trade products is the European Union (EU) which is thus a crucial actor when it comes to promote and market Fair Trade goods (see attached table 1). Yet, besides the EU's effort of achieving a fairer international trading system, it can be argued that the EU might be even partially responsible for the misery in those countries. In this context the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) of the EU is controversially discussed. About 60 billion which account for 42% of the total EU budget are currently spent on agricultural subsidies. They are provided to European farmers...
